VIROQUA traces its lineage back to 1978 with one of my first attempts at type design, Excalibur. This early design was inspired by Hermann Zapf typefaces, such as Palatino. I did a second and third version, adding the influence of Jim Parkinson's custom Rolling Stone Jenson-like typeface (which he later released as Parkinson). With naïve confidence, I submitted it to International Typeface Corporation (ITC), where it was (understandably) rejected. Although I'd put a lot of work into it, it made me realized how much I still had to learn about type design. I set it aside and worked on other ideas and on improving my skills.

In 1987, I revisited Excalibur using a new font editor for the Mac called Fontographer. This was a complete rethinking, addressing many of the flaws of the earilier versions. It was accepted by FontHaus in 1992, but took two more years to finish. It was finally released in 1994. The name Excalibur was taken, so I renamed it "Kandal"—my paternal grandmother's maiden name.

Over the years, I've thought about redoing Kandal. It's one of my earliest releases. But the more time has passed, the more flaws I see in it. It's no surprise to me that it is not one of my popular typefaces. In 2018, I began making a new version, utilizing the many years of experience I'd gained since I'd released it. It was different enough that I decided to change the name. Rather than call it something like "Kandal Nova," I settled on "Viroqua," which is the name of the little town in Southwestern Wisconsin where my paternal grandmother was born.

THE EVOLUTION OF VIROQUA.

Viroqua is a hybrid design, combining elements of old style in the details and modern in the proportions. It has relatively low contrast modulation throughout the weight range, and the wedge-shaped serifs work more like slab serifs as they gain weight. Viroqua is very comfortable to read in text, and the boldest weights provide a lot of impact at display sizes.

Viroqua features many typographical niceties missing from Kandal, such as small caps, old style and lining figures (both proportional and tabular), superscript and subscript figures, fractions, and dingbats. Viroqua also supports most Latin-based Western and Eastern European languages, plus Vietnamese. —MARK SIMONSON

STYLISTIC MAPPING (PLAIN, ITALIC, BOLD, BOLD ITALIC)

In Microsoft Office and other Windows applications, Viroqua is broken into smaller "sub-families" that work with the I (italic) and B (bold) buttons on toolbars.

Only the first member of each group appears in the font listing in such applications and is the "plain" style within that group. The others are "italic," "bold," and "bold italic" respectively:

GROUP 1: Thin, Thin Italic
GROUP 2: Light, Light Italic
GROUP 3: Regular, Italic, Bold, Bold Italic
GROUP 4: Semibold, Semibold Italic
GROUP 5: Extrabold, Extrabold Italic
GROUP 6: Black, Black Italic

For example, to use Viroqua Bold Italic, choose Viroqua Regular from the font list and then click the I and B buttons on the toolbar (or use the keyboard shortcuts). Note: The "bold" button only works with the Regular style. The "italic" button works with all styles.

Not all applications support stylistic mapping. Use of stylistic mapping is optional and not necessarily recommended for some pre-press workflows. It is often better to select fonts direcly. Professional design applications such as Adobe Creative Cloud and QuarkXPress do this by default, even when you use keyboard shortcuts for bold or italic.
